Thinking of a vacation at a national park this summer? The National Park Service hopes so.

Interior Secretary Ken Salazar said today that the agency would waive fees at the 147 parks that charge an entrance fee during June 20-21, July 18-19 and August 15-16. The fees range from $3 to $25, and Salazar says waiving them will boost tourism and the economy. Another 244 parks don't charge fees.

Most Americans live less than a day's drive from one of the parks, and more than 275 million people took advantage and visited one last year. Those visitors brought in $10.6 billion to the local economies and supported more than 213,000 jobs outside of the parks, according to the park service.

If you don't feel like traveling, check out one of the sites in Maryland.

Photo of Fort McHenry courtesy of the National Park Service